Excerpt: . not to work at the millinery at night, and Nina passed the time while Polly was at the theatre in reading--and dreaming of the past. One night Polly asked her to go to the theatre to see Miss Tracey, who wanted a new hat, and insisted upon giving the instructions herself. We can t have her here; they d all want to come. Nina hesitated, but at last consented. Behind the scenes is always somewhat awe-inspiring to the novice, and Nina made a nervous grab at Polly s hand as they passed among the forest of wings and back cloths to Miss Tracey s dressing room. That young lady was making up for the idiotic first piece; but, after a stare of something like surprise, she received Nina in the friendly hail-fellowwell-met fashion of the profession, and explained what it was she wanted. The call boy summoned hefi in the midst of her elaborate description. Don t go yet; wait till I come off again, Miss Wood, she said. P r aps you d like to go to the wings and see the play. I ll put it right with thfy stage manager. She got the permission, and Nina went up and stood out of sight. She d seen the play once too often; and instead of listening to the vapid dialogue she let her mind wander. It wandered in so strange a direction that she roused herself with a start. Well, silly...
