Army Research Institute for the Behavioral and Social Sciences, 2001 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)318201855 Subject: Cognitive learning. Excerpt: . . . Training design principles. Behaviorism was used as the basis for designing many of the early audio-visual materials and teaching strategies, such as Skinners teaching machines and programmed texts. More recently these principles have been used in computer-assisted instruction and mastery learning. Training development requires the separation of tasks into sequential elements, and that a method be provided for the pre-assessment of students to determine where instruction should begin. Table 2 presents behaviorist principles identified by Ertmer and Newby (1993), annotated with training techniques that could be implemented in the FBCB2 prototype training modules. Table 2 Behaviorist Principles and Related Training Techniques Behaviorist Principles Training Techniques 1. Observable and measurable outcomes.
